Preconference Workshops

Prof. M. Joseph Sirgy

Workshop 1: A Crash Course in the Psychology of Well-Being

11:00 - 12:30
FJ 303

The proposed workshop serves to introduce many novice QOL researchers to the burgeoning research on the psychology of well-being to help them ease into this stream of research with some confidence. The workshop will provide an overview of the following areas of research on the psychology of well-being:

- Philosophical Foundations, Definitions, and Measures
- Consequences of Happiness
- Objective Reality and Its Effects on Happiness
- Subjective Reality and Its Effects on Happiness
- Life Domains and Their Effects on Happiness
- Population Segments and Happiness

Workshop 2: ISQOLS' Certification Program in Community QOL Indicators Research

13:30 - 15:00
FJ 303

This workshop is designed to provide the audience with enough information about ISQOLS' Certification Program in Community QOL Indicators Research. The workshop will cover the following topics:

- Objectives of the certification program
- Who might be interested in this certification program and why
- Application requirements for eligibility
- Methods of course delivery
- Overview of the course content (introduction to community QOL indicators research, an example of a well-accepted community QOL indicators system, the planning stage, the development stage, the implementation stage, and using indicators to create social change)
- Course reading materials and other resources
- Course tuition
- Course exam and certification

Workshop 3: Defining and Measuring Well-Being as a Multi-Dimensional Construct

15:30 - 17:00
FJ 303

If something is worth measuring, it is worth measuring well. This workshop is based on the premise that subjective well-being is worth measuring, but is rarely measured well, and we need to do better. Subjective well-being is worth measuring because how we experience our lives really matters; it cannot be inferred from the objective facts of our lives. And while a high level of subjective well-being has many instrumental or downstream benefits, the real reason it matters is that it is an end in itself – an ultimate good.

Workshop participants will be invited to reflect on what gives their life a sense of well-being, and how their insights might be captured in a high-quality survey measure. We will also explore the extent to which subjective well-being can be measured using a single item or a single composite score, which is the approach used in most surveys. We will discuss the value of a multi-dimensional approach to the measurement of well-being, and present cross-national data showing that countries with an identical score on a standard life satisfaction measure, may have vastly different profiles on some dimensions that underlie well-being.

Findings such as this have important implications for policy. For a subjective well-being measure to be useful for policy, we need not only a summary score, but also the ability to unpack that score into its components, so that it is possible to identify which dimensions should be targeted in a particular group or nation if we wish to improve well-being.
